Photoshop makes it easier and easier to do amazing things with digital images. Each time I investigate its features to review a new version, I discover new capabilities, even ones that have long existed, so great is the program's depth. Integrated stock photography, advanced font tools, and organizational and syncing features, such as Cloud Documents and Libraries, are unique to the application. Photoshop Elements is hugely underrated, because it just isn't seen as generally useful. Even in a small enough niche that most people will never even try it, it provides far more than a typical person needs. Few people who claim that they use Photoshop Elements or Lightroom are in fact operating at their full potential. Adobe Acrobat Pro and Adobe Sound Forge are PC-only apps. I am not thrilled with some of the editing limitations in Adobe Premiere Elements. One example is that you cannot mask multiple layers in edit mode. That's a total drag for me, and — even in a special, made-for-video conferencing program — is something I really miss from my days in professional video — not to mention audio editing. While some people may find all of the features in Adobe Elements so helpful to their skills in video conferencing, I think many people will find it less effective because of the limitations. Adobe debuted the first version with the 'PS' logo. On the whole, I think the brand needs a re-brand. Perhaps it would make sense for Photoshop to promote itself as the most flexible, all-in-one solutions for graphic design, photography and video editing. That could give Photoshop a marketing identity as fulfilling as Photoshop gives the camera. We can never know what might be in Adobe's marketing memo files or what is waiting in the wings, but the brand promise seems pretty limited. Even for shooting still photos, a Photoshop citizen must use Photoshop Elements.
