I was reading about Angular in Pluralsight's course and I came across the following code: `myApp.factory('keywordService', function($http) { var service = {}; service.keyword = function(id) { return $http.get('/keyword.php?id=' + id); }; return service; }); myApp.controller('keywordController', function($scope, keywordService) { $scope.keyword = keywordService.keyword; });` The plunker is here: I don't get what the difference is between the factory and the controller in this case. A: Controllers are for instantiating data and delegates UI events. For example, if you want to do something when the user enters and leaves the page, you would put a listener on an element in the DOM that the controller listens for that event. Factories are for creating objects and manipulating data. They can be injected into controllers. In this example the service that is created is injected into the controller so the keywordService object is available to the controller's methods. This kind of pattern is called service-driven development and is used for anything that doesn't fit into your view (which is AngularJS's own view). A: As mentioned in the comments under your question, Angular controllers are basically just pieces of code that instantiate data. Think of them as little mobile apps that handle data passed to and from the DOM. Services are typically class files that provide the code for something that you have to use across your app. If you have to use
