Fluorescence detection has been used for many years to detect small molecules such as drugs, proteins, and DNA. In the past, detection limits for these molecules were typically in the submicromolar range, so this mode of detection is readily employed for the analysis of small molecules. Recent innovations in detection technology have resulted in the detection of subnanomolar concentrations of biomolecules. As a result, fluorescence detection systems will most likely continue to be used for the detection of small biomolecules.
